The Anishinaabe-language content in this dictionary is the cultural and intellectual property of the Anishinaabe communities from which the language comes. Editorial stewardship is exercised under the principles of OCAP (Ownership, Control, Access, and Possession) on behalf of the participating communities. Commercial use of the Anishinaabe-language content requires community consent; non-commercial use for language learning, translation, and academic research is encouraged with attribution.

The Chinese-language equivalents in this first edition were generated by automated translation and have not yet been reviewed by a Sinologist. They are provided as editorial drafts and should be verified before use in formal or legal contexts.

This dictionary is published as a working reference for the Government Anishinaabe Programme. It is the first bidirectional Chinese-Anishinaabe dictionary and the first dictionary to use the Government Anishinaabe script as a primary headword orthography with Hangul phonetic bridging for Chinese-speaking learners.

*To the Anishinaabe elders and language keepers whose patience preserves the words, and to the civil servants
whose care puts them to work.*

Foreword

By the Editorial Board, Government Anishinaabe Programme

I. The Need for This Dictionary

This dictionary exists because two civilizations, each with deep and continuing traditions of governance, are meeting in administrative contexts where neither has ever operated before. The Anishinaabe nations have governed their territories and peoples since time immemorial, with political traditions that long predate the colonial encounter; the Chinese state has governed continuously for over three thousand years, with administrative traditions that have shaped every modern bureaucracy. Until now, no working dictionary has existed to translate administrative vocabulary between these two languages. Civil servants, treaty negotiators, community liaisons, translators, and language learners have had to work without a desk reference — relying on ad hoc interpretation, on intermediaries, or on the English language as a default bridge that is, for both communities, a colonial imposition.

The Government Anishinaabe Programme was established to bring Anishinaabemowin into working use as a government language, parallel in function to Mandarin Chinese, English, and French in Canadian federal service. The Programme has produced a 51,247-entry corpus, a Level 1 Coursebook teaching the Government Anishinaabe script, and an Administrative State Manual defining the conceptual universe the language must express. This dictionary is the fourth pillar: the practitioner’s reference that ties the other three together and makes them usable in daily work.

II. Editorial Principles

The dictionary is bidirectional. Section I (Anishinaabe → Chinese) lists every entry alphabetically by the Fiero double-vowel orthography, which is the standard romanization of Anishinaabemowin and the form in which every existing Ojibwe dictionary is sorted. Section II (Chinese → Anishinaabe) lists the same entries alphabetically by pinyin. The user who knows the Anishinaabe word and wants the Chinese equivalent uses Section I; the user who knows the Chinese word and wants the Anishinaabe equivalent uses Section II. Both sections give the English gloss for cross-reference, because English remains the working lingua franca of Canadian federal administration and because the source corpus was compiled with English glosses.

Each entry has four components. The headword gives the source-language form, with pronunciation in the Hangul phonetic bridge for Anishinaabe entries or pinyin for Chinese entries. The metadata line gives part of speech (using the Algonquianist categories VAI, VTI, VTA, VII for verbs and an/in for noun animacy), semantic domain (drawn from a controlled vocabulary aligned to the Administrative State Manual), and attestation status. The equivalent gives the target-language translation, with pronunciation. The English gloss gives the bridging English term for users working across all three languages.

Attestation status is the editorial heart of the dictionary. An entry marked attested is drawn from existing Anishinaabe usage and has been validated by a Language Keeper. An entry marked constructed is a Programme-derived calque or composition that extends the language into administrative registers it did not previously cover; these entries have been through morphological review but have not all been confirmed by community review. An entry marked loan is borrowed from another language — the Programme’s editorial policy deliberately sources loanwords from Mandarin, Turkish, Indonesian, and Swahili, refusing the colonial pattern of borrowing from English or French. An entry marked neologism is a fresh coinage, the most politically sensitive category, requiring explicit community consent before being marked confirmed.

III. The Hangul Phonetic Bridge

A distinctive feature of this dictionary is the Hangul phonetic bridge. Every Anishinaabe headword is given a phonetic transcription in the Hangul (Korean) script, appearing in square brackets after the headword. This is not because Anishinaabe is in any way related to Korean; it is a deliberate editorial choice with three justifications. First, the Government Anishinaabe script is itself Hangul-derived, designed in the twenty-first century by adapting the Korean featural alphabet to Anishinaabe phonology, so the Hangul bridge is structurally coherent with the Programme’s orthographic system. Second, Hangul is a featural and syllabic script that captures phonetic distinctions (aspiration, tensing, vowel length) more transparently than any Latin romanization, which makes it an excellent pronunciation guide for learners. Third, Chinese-speaking learners — the dictionary’s primary audience — typically learn Hangul more easily than IPA, because Hangul’s syllable-block structure is conceptually similar to the structure of Chinese characters, and because Korean is widely studied as a second language in China.

Users should treat the Hangul bridge as a pronunciation aid, not as a second orthography. The Government Anishinaabe script remains the primary writing system; the Fiero double-vowel orthography is the standard romanized form used in academic and lexicographic contexts; the Hangul bridge is for learners who need to pronounce the word. The IPA is reserved for the full scholarly edition planned for the third year of the Programme.

IV. The Source Corpus and Selection

This dictionary contains 2,460 entries per direction, drawn by selection from the Government Anishinaabe Programme’s 51,247-entry source corpus. The selection prioritized entries with confirmed editorial review (about two-thirds of the selected entries have CONFIRMED status), entries with real part-of-speech analysis rather than the generic “phrase” tag, entries with semantic domain tags aligned to the Administrative State Manual, and the most frequent English glosses in administrative use. The full corpus remains available for the planned scholarly edition; this practitioner’s edition is the working slice that fits on a civil servant’s desk.

Selection is editorial, not exhaustive. A practitioner’s dictionary does not record every variant of every word; it records the one best form per concept, with the most authoritative attestation available. Where the corpus contains multiple entries for the same English gloss, the dictionary gives the entry with the best etymological provenance and the highest review status. Where the corpus contains entries that are clearly derivation-engine artifacts (hyphen-joined forms flagged for morphological review), these have been excluded from this edition pending re-analysis. The scholarly edition will include the full corpus with editorial commentary on each entry’s status.

V. The Anti-Colonial Loanword Strategy

Readers will notice that loanwords in this dictionary come from Mandarin Chinese, Turkish, Indonesian, and Swahili — never from English or French. This is a deliberate editorial choice. The standard pattern in Indigenous language lexicography is to borrow administrative vocabulary from the dominant colonial language: Cree borrowed from English, Māori from English, Hawaiian from English. The result is that the Indigenous language becomes structurally subordinate to the colonial one, with administrative concepts always carrying the colonial linguistic imprint. The Government Anishinaabe Programme refuses this pattern. Instead, it sources loanwords from languages that have their own histories of decolonial state-building: Turkish (reformed from Ottoman under Atatürk), Indonesian (constructed from Malay as a unifying national language), Swahili (expanded from a regional trade language into a national language of Tanzania and Kenya), and Mandarin (the world’s largest state-language by speakers, with its own modernization history).

The strategy is not absolute. Where a native Anishinaabe calque is transparent (opacity score above 0.4), it is preferred to any loanword; the corpus records 97 such calque overrides, each with the original loanword and the reason for replacement. Where a concept has no Anishinaabe semantic resource at all, a loanword is preferred to a neologism, because loanwords are easier for the community to evaluate and reject. Neologisms — entirely new coinages — are reserved for concepts where neither calque nor loanword is feasible, and each neologism requires explicit Elder’s Council approval before being marked confirmed.

VI. Limitations of This Edition

Three limitations should be acknowledged. First, the Chinese equivalents in this edition were generated by automated translation and have not been reviewed by a Sinologist. They are reliable for common administrative terms but should be verified before use in formal or legal contexts. A Sinologist review is planned for the second edition. Second, the Anishinaabe forms are drawn from the Programme’s corpus, which is a constructed diplomatic register based largely on Southwestern Ojibwe; speakers of other Anishinaabe dialects (Severn Ojibwe, Oji-Cree) may find some forms unfamiliar, and a dialect-variants edition is planned. Third, the morphological decomposition (initial-medial-final analysis) is not yet complete for all entries; this edition gives the surface form but not the full morphological breakdown, which will appear in the scholarly edition.

These limitations are the price of publishing a working dictionary now rather than a perfect dictionary in a decade. A civil servant who needs to translate “procurement” into Anishinaabemowin today cannot wait for the scholarly edition; this dictionary exists to serve that civil servant, with the understanding that the editorial work continues and that subsequent editions will be more authoritative.

VII. How to Use This Dictionary

To find the Chinese equivalent of an Anishinaabe word: turn to Section I, find the headword alphabetically by the Fiero orthography (the romanized form), and read the Chinese equivalent with pinyin. To find the Anishinaabe equivalent of a Chinese word: turn to Section II, find the headword alphabetically by pinyin, and read the Anishinaabe equivalent with Hangul phonetic. If you cannot find the exact word you are looking for, try the first word of a multi-word phrase, or consult the English gloss in the opposite section to find a related entry.

When using an entry in formal or legal contexts, check the attestation status. Attested entries can be used with confidence. Constructed entries should be used with awareness that they are Programme-derived forms that may not yet have community confirmation. Loan entries are typically well-established in the Programme’s register but may be unfamiliar to traditional speakers. Neologism entries are provisional and should be used with particular care. The domain tag indicates the professional context where the term is most likely to appear; ADMIN for administrative, TREATY for treaty and rights contexts, HEALTH for health and wellness, and so on. A full list of domain tags appears in the Abbreviations section.

Pronunciation Guide

The Fiero Double-Vowel Orthography

The Fiero double-vowel orthography is the standard romanization of Anishinaabemowin, used in every existing Ojibwe dictionary and in academic Algonquianist literature. It uses single letters for most consonants (with the digraphs sh, ch, zh for postalveolar fricatives and affricates), and uses double vowel letters (aa, ee, ii, oo, uu) for long vowels. The apostrophe represents the glottal stop, a real consonant in Anishinaabemowin that distinguishes meaning (e.g., zaagi’idiwin “love” vs. zaagidiwin “opening”). The Fiero system is used in this dictionary for sorting Anishinaabe entries alphabetically.

The Government Anishinaabe Script

The Government Anishinaabe script is the Programme’s primary writing system, taught in Book A1 of the Programme’s coursebook series. It is a featural alphabet derived from the Korean Hangul, adapted to Anishinaabe phonology. Each syllable is written as a block, with consonants indicated by the shape of the block and vowels indicated by additional marks within the block. A combining macron above the block marks long vowels; a dedicated glottal-stop letter (yesorieun, ᄆ) marks the glottal stop as a distinct consonant rather than an apostrophe. The script is not used as the primary headword orthography in this first edition (the Fiero orthography is used instead, for compatibility with existing Ojibwe dictionaries), but the Government script edition is planned.

The Hangul Phonetic Bridge

The Hangul phonetic bridge gives a phonetic transcription of each Anishinaabe headword in the Korean Hangul script, appearing in square brackets. Hangul is a featural alphabet designed in the fifteenth century by King Sejong the Great, where consonant shapes indicate articulation (lip shape, tongue position, aspiration) and vowel marks indicate tongue position and lip rounding. The Hangul bridge in this dictionary is a phonetic representation, not a separate orthography: it shows how the word sounds, using a script that Chinese-speaking learners can read with minimal additional training. Long vowels in Anishinaabe are indicated by a macron above the Hangul syllable block; the glottal stop is represented by a dedicated letter (ᄆ, yesorieun).

Pinyin

Pinyin is the official romanization of Mandarin Chinese, used in this dictionary for sorting Chinese entries alphabetically and for giving the pronunciation of Chinese headwords. Tones are marked with diacritics: ā á ǎ à (first, second, third, fourth tone). The neutral tone is unmarked. Where a Chinese term has multiple pronunciations or where tone sandhi applies (notably the third-tone sandhi, where two consecutive third tones become second-third), the dictionary gives the citation form; the user should consult a Mandarin pronunciation guide for connected-speech rules.

English Glosses

The English gloss in each entry is the bridging term from the source corpus. It is not a definition; it is the English equivalent that the Programme used when constructing or attesting the Anishinaabe form. In cases where the English gloss is a sentence fragment rather than a single word (reflecting the source corpus’s structure), the user should focus on the headword and equivalent; the English is for editorial provenance, not for direct use.

Editorial Note

The editorial work of this dictionary continues. This first edition is published to meet an immediate operational need — the Government Anishinaabe Programme requires a working desk reference for civil servants, treaty negotiators, and translators — and the editorial standards of subsequent editions will build on the foundations laid here. The editorial board plans the following improvements for the second and third editions.

Planned for the Second Edition

Sinologist review of all Chinese equivalents. The current Chinese equivalents were generated by automated translation and are reliable for common administrative terms but uneven for specialized vocabulary. A Sinologist will review every entry, correcting translations where the automated process chose the wrong Chinese near-synonym and adding register notes where appropriate.

Morphological decomposition for every Anishinaabe headword. The current edition gives the surface form of each Anishinaabe word but not the morphological breakdown into initial, medial, and final components. The second edition will add this decomposition, following the Algonquianist tradition, so that users can recognize morphological families and so that the dictionary can support future NLP applications.

Example sentences from the Coursebook. The Government Anishinaabe Coursebook (Book B1) contains dozens of trilingual example sentences in its Core Dialogues. The second edition will link relevant example sentences to dictionary entries, making the dictionary a pedagogical as well as a reference resource.

Planned for the Third (Scholarly) Edition

Full corpus publication. The scholarly edition will include all 51,247 entries from the source corpus, with full etymological records, dialect variants, attestation histories, and bibliographic citations. It will be published in TEI Lex-0 format for archival and digital humanities use, alongside the LIFT working format and the print edition.

Elder’s Council confirmation of all CONSTRUCTED and NEOLOGISM entries. The current edition marks these entries with their construction status but does not yet have full community confirmation. The third edition will record the Elder’s Council review decisions for every constructed and neologistic entry, with the council’s reasoning documented in the etymology field.

Dialect variants. The current edition is based on the Southwestern Ojibwe dialect that the Programme uses as its working register. The third edition will record variants from other Anishinaabe dialects (Severn Ojibwe, Oji-Cree, Algonquin), with dialect tags on each entry.

Acknowledgments

This dictionary is the work of many hands. The Government Anishinaabe Programme’s editorial board acknowledges, first, the Anishinaabe elders and language keepers whose knowledge of the language is the foundation of everything in this volume. Their patience in reviewing constructed forms, their corrections of morphological errors, and their guidance on ceremonial and spiritual vocabulary are the editorial backbone of the Programme. The Programme’s Elder’s Council, which meets monthly to review entries, deserves particular acknowledgment for the time and care they give to this work.

The Programme’s lexicographic team — the Senior Lexicographer, the Anishinaabe Language Keeper, the Sinologist, the Domain Specialist (Public Administration), and the Computational Lexicographer — have built the editorial system that produced this dictionary. The team’s work is documented in the Editorial Note above and in the Programme’s internal editorial records.

The Centre for Administrative Services, on behalf of the Government Anishinaabe Programme, has provided the institutional support and the funding that made this dictionary possible. The Centre’s commitment to publishing a working edition now, with the understanding that subsequent editions will be more authoritative, reflects a strategic decision to serve operational needs while continuing the editorial work.

The Z.ai Lexicography Advisory provided editorial and computational support for this first edition, including the automated translation of Chinese equivalents, the layout and typesetting, and the editorial review of the source corpus. The Advisory’s work is documented in the Strategic Advisory published alongside this dictionary.

Finally, the Programme acknowledges the civil servants, translators, and language learners who will use this dictionary in daily work. Their feedback — corrections, omissions, suggestions for additional entries — will shape the second edition. The Programme welcomes correspondence addressed to the Editorial Board, Centre for Administrative Services.

Colophon

This first edition of A Chinese–Anishinaabe Practitioner’s Dictionary was set in FreeSerif (Latin), NotoSerifSC (Chinese), and SarasaMonoSC (Hangul phonetic bridge). The cover and front matter were designed in the editorial style of the Government Anishinaabe Reference Series, with a double-rule border frame in the institutional oxblood palette. The dictionary sections are set in a two-column layout on A4 paper, with running headers and footers carrying the book title, publisher, edition, and page number. The full-page section dividers use a centered typographic treatment with the Programme’s accent color.

The editorial pipeline runs from a 51,247-entry source corpus in JSON format, through a selection algorithm that prioritizes editorial review status and semantic domain coverage, to a LIFT-compatible intermediate representation, to the published PDF and DOCX outputs. The pipeline is fully scripted and reproducible: any subsequent edition can be regenerated from the version-controlled source data. The editorial team is committed to the long-term sustainability of the dictionary as a reference work, with plans for annual revisions and a major scholarly edition every five years.
